It is obviously depicted in the chart that the rising scale of mobile-phone subscription shows distinctly difference between developing and developed country. In 2000, mobile-phone subscription in developing country is no more than in developed countries while eight years later the situation came out a reverse that the subscription number of developing countries got four time beyond the developed's'.

Behind the phenomenon situated many reasons. In the early era of the development of mobile-phone industry indicated a simple fact that the high-tech companies tend to emerge in the developed countries first. In return, people in the developed countries have more easier access to get a mobile-phone subscription when the people in developing countries waiting for import of the latest technology.

As the saying goes: "Every dog has its day." The developing countries hold the majority of population in the world as well as the much wilder marketing scale than the developed countries. Meanwhile, it doesn't take a long time for developing countries to take a page from the developed countries in the wake of the trend of globalization and urbanization.

Luckily, we were born in an era of free and open. Wish the world would process in a peaceful mode and all the nations collaborating to make human a greater life.
